

5 REASONS TO OWN YOUR PROPANE TANK

When it comes to your home's or company's propane, you usually have two options.

The first option is often the default option. You contact a local propane company, lease one of their propane tanks, and have them service and supply your propane.

The second option is to buy your own propane tank and have it installed, making you the owner of the propane tank.

Many people choose the first option because it seems the easiest route to take. However, it results in a problem - it ties you to that specific company's propane pricing, customer service, and fees.

On the other hand, if you own your propane tank, you are free to choose the propane supplier and provider you want - giving you complete control and freedom over your propane.

If you need a new propane service installed, or if you don't currently own your propane tank, here are five reasons you need to own your propane tank!

Shop for the Best Propane Pricing

There is no denying it - by far, the best benefit of owning your propane tank is having the freedom to shop around for the best propane pricing!

When you lease a propane tank from a company, you are not allowed to have other companies supply the propane. This means you are stuck with that company's pricing as long as you have their tank.

Owning your propane tank, on the other hand, allows you to contact several propane suppliers in your area to see who provides the best pricing and service.

No more outrageous propane bills simply because you had to pay their price. Instead, you can shop for the pricing that fits your budget!

No Annual Fees or Contracts

While this does not happen with every propane company, some companies charge a leasing or agreement fee when you have one of their tanks.

This annual fee and contract are rare with residences and homes, but it can apply to businesses and other commercial settings.

As long as you are leasing the company's propane tanks, they have the right to charge you these fees.

How do you rid yourself of these fees, especially if you are a business?

Own your own propane tank and stop worrying about propane contracts and fees!

Not Tied to One Company

We've all experienced poor customer service, and we know how irritating it feels when we are treated poorly as a customer.

When you lease a propane tank, that means you are tied not only to that company's propane pricing but also to their customer service, company regulations, and other policies.

This doesn't mean propane companies have terrible customer service or bad business models - many of them have great people working for them and solid business models!

What it does mean, however, is that you are free to work with the company that you choose.

You don't need to worry about a company's service or requirements when you own your propane tank. Instead, you decide which company you want to have on your side.

Choose Your Own Certified Installer

When you purchase and own your propane tank, you also have the freedom to choose the company that you want to install the tank and connect it to your lines.

When choosing a propane installer, you need to make sure they are fully licensed and insured for propane installation.

Installing propane tanks and connecting the lines requires state certification, so make sure the installer you choose has the correct credentials.

However, you still have the freedom to choose the propane installer of your choosing instead of needing to work only with a single company to install and service your propane system.

Experience Complete Freedom with Your Propane

When you own your propane tank and setup, you are in complete control over your propane.

You no longer have to worry about price fluctuations or new customer reps at the propane company. Instead, you have complete freedom knowing you can change suppliers, choose the company to do the installation and service work, and not worry about any unexpected charges or fees.

If you want peace of mind and freedom with your propane pricing and setup, purchase your own propane tank today and experience the difference!
